

Work & Life

Health

life made easier, every day

■get a FREE PREVIEW issue • free NEWSLETTERS

Search

Entire Site

Just Recipes Search

Make RealSimple.com My Homepage

Special: Simply Stated Blogs | Wedding Planning | Halloween Ideas | Real Simple Rewards | Makeover Tool | SUBSCRIBE

Sign-In to RealSimple.com Magazine & More

Homepage

Food & Recipes

Work & Life

Life Strategies

Home & Organizing

Beauty & Fashion Job & Career

Holidays & Entertaining

SHARE:

PRINT E-MAIL COMMENT SAVE

How to Find a Job (Yes, Even Now)

In a job market that's nothing short of daunting, these nine women recently landed terrific positions. They share their strategies with you.

by Stephanie Booth

"I Put an Ad on Facebook"

Marian Schembari

The job she landed: Book publicist.

 $\textbf{How she did it:} \ \textbf{When Marian, 23, graduated from college in May 2009, she}$ hoped to work in publishing. Inspired by a book she had read about "guerilla $marketing"\ (a.k.a.\ unconventional\ self-promotion),\ she\ posted\ ads\ for\ a\ job\ she$ wanted on Facebook, using the site's template and targeting users who had disclosed in their profiles that they worked for a major New York City publisher. Alongside a smiling photo of herself, the headline read, I WANT TO WORK AT... and the name of the publishing house listed in the user's profile. Those who clicked on the ad were taken to Marian's résumé, which she says received more than 700 views in two weeks. Not long afterward, she landed a gig at a boutique publishing firm. She has since moved on to become a freelance socialmedia consultant, and she credits the ads with giving her a career boost. "It was an attention-getting tactic," she admits. "But I needed to take a risk to land the position I wanted."

Make This Strategy Work for You

Be succinct. You have only 160 characters to work with in a Facebook ad.

Project a professional appearance. Include a photo of yourself in interview attire, says Mauri Schwartz, president of a San Francisco-based careermanagement firm.

Take a more conservative route if you're looking for a job in finance, government, or education. E-mail potential employers a link to your résumé

Get Surprising Tips and Tricks Each Week

Sign up for our free Real Simple Weekly Tips newsletter (see a sample)

Enter E-mail Address

Quick Tip

Purchase tickets under the name that appears on your I.D. It might seem obvious, but it will avoid confusion when you're asked to show proof before boarding. See more travel tips.

Poll
	How often do you work from home?
a. Regu	ılarly.
b. Occa	isionally.
n c. Rare	lv.

Submit Que

d. Never.